

We have shown that the goal of the United Nations Organization is to create a new world religion. Obviously, in order to carry out their plan something had to be done with Christianity, which claims there is only one way to God.

To deal with it, Alice Bailey suggested Christianity must be either destroyed or made to become less of an influence in the world. She suggested two things to accomplish her goal.

First, to create an interfaith movement. She believed that promoting other faiths to be at par with Christianity would eventually pull it down. Second, to get the Church to endorse all the changes she mentions in her famous ten-point charter.

However, in order to be effective, very subtle methods had to be devised to break the Church's resistance to change. These methods would have to have a very slow and gradual effect so that most people would not realize how far they had strayed from biblical truth.

The first of these deceptions was ecumenism. This is often defined as the efforts of Christian Churches and their members to promote mutual understanding of the faith and, ultimately, unity among them all. The World Council of Churches works toward this goal.

The second method devised to break resistance to change involved the introduction of a methodology to break down the wall of separation between believers and the World. We are speaking of the Seeker Sensitive Philosophy. People were duped into believing that the methods of their spiritual leaders behind the pulpit was to get the unsaved to come to Church.
